

Abstract

Cosmological constant problem is arguably the deepest gap in our understanding of modern physics. In this talk, after introducing the problem, I argue how its solution might be related to the solution to another long-standing problem, i.e. quantum gravity. I then present a new formulation of gravity that does not suffer from the cosmological constant problem, and argue why it might be preferred by cosmological observations.”