

Abstract

While within the standard model, lepton flavor violating rare processes are extremely suppressed, various beyond standard model scenarios can give rise to such processes. There are a myriad of experiments searching for such processes. Although, for the time being, they all have reported null results, in future such processes might be detected. Moreover new physics can include new sources of CP-violation.