

There are many pieces of evidence that non baryonic dark matter (DM) is the dominating matter component in the Universe and the building block for all visible structures. Weakly interacting massive particles (WIMPs) are well motivated candidates for DM based on theoretical grounds. After briefly discussing the methods of WIMP detection, we focus on indirect searches and the important role gamma ray measurements play.