

Active particles, also known as micro-swimmers (e.g. the vast majority of bacteria), are typically found in confined fluid environments subjected to imposed flow. In this short talk, I shall discuss how "chirality" of the micro-swimmers (very common in biological and artificial types) affects the steady-state behaviour of an active suspension subjected to an imposed flow.